First, a client writes to our backend, and he gives us a private key, encrypted with the client's public key. That's because one of the objects we implement is that of a client. We create a Client object, and save it on disk. We can also create one from scratch (or use an existing one we have built) by calling the constructor. Creating a Client object from scratch is simple. You send a message to the server, and the server will send back a certificate signed with the private key you gave us. We will examine the certificate shortly. Setting up the Client object The constructor takes one parameter, a message string. That message will be encoded as Base64, and concatenated to the end of the "client" file. Here is the constructor: As you can see, the client file stores a lot of information. For our purposes here, that's fine. But it's not always the case. It could be helpful to know more about the client, for example, his real name. Or we could want to sign messages with more than one signature. Saving a Client object on disk The client object we create is saved using the createOneObject method. Here is how: // method for saving a new client object public static Client createOneObject (String clientFileName) { // retrieve client information clientInfo = getClientInfo(); // open existing file if one exists ClientInfo clientInfo = null ; // if file exists, open it and convert to string try { clientFile = new File(clientFileName); clientInfo = getClientInfo(clientFileName); String clientInfoAsString = clientFile.getAbsolutePath(); } catch (IOException ex) { // file doesn't exist } // if file exists, try to read it as a string if (clientFile != null) { if (clientInfo == null) { // if not, read file as string and return client info 3e33713323
