An important mechanism for the control of light and dark in photosynthetic organisms is the phytochrome photoreceptor protein which has been shown to be required for the growth of green algae. The phytochrome photoreceptor has three functional forms: a red light absorbing form, a far-red light absorbing form, and a light insensitive form. Such photoreceptors exist in the cyanobacterial and algae "chromatic" perception. Using as a model system the cyanobacterial phytochrome

(phy), we propose to examine the molecular and biochemical mechanisms of phy signaling in E. coli and in higher plant cells. In the E. coli system the low frequency utilization of the phy in the signaling event required for commitment to stationary phase growth and for the induction of the bacteriophage lambda SOS response can be studied. In addition, the high frequency utilization of phy in the phytochrome signaling event will be examined as will its trans-kingdom interaction with the phyA (Dde) photoreceptor of Agrobacterium tumefaciens. The phy A protein alters an adenylate cyclase mediated signal transduction cascade which includes a unique convergent regulatory pathway for both E. coli and A. tumefaciens. Finally, the timing of the phy signals in photoresponsive plant cells is examined with particular attention to the phytochrome's role as a circadian signal.

Surveillance of childhood injury mortality: a review of surveillance data and policy options. Childhood injuries are leading causes of death worldwide, yet the quantity and quality of childhood injury mortality surveillance data are limited. We reviewed the literature on major surveillance mechanisms of childhood injury mortality, including health and police data, as well as the capacity to use these data for monitoring and policy development. Our review revealed substantial gaps and inconsistencies in availability of data for monitoring and policy development. We concluded that a comprehensive national surveillance system for childhood injury mortality is urgently needed to foster consistent, reliable, and comprehensive data on which to base policy and measure performance.

Column 1 Column 4 Column 7 In another column I have to display the subtotal for all the column whose value is in a row. So the total for column one has to be shown in column 8 and the subtotal for columns 4 to 7 has to be shown in column 9. I cannot divide the total and subtotal columns, because the number of columns can be more or less. So is there any way to extend the number of columns such that the total can be displayed in one of the existing column and subtotal can be displayed in the other. A: If I
